Not illustrated. 1879 Excerpt: .will they bloom upon thy brow, Where they shall never fade. Ah! happy child! words cannot tell How far beyond thy dream Is that blest land where thou shalt dwell In bliss untold, supreme. The angel ceased; no other word Fell on my longing ear: I breathless lay until I heard Thy footstep coming near. Oh! I have made a happy choice. Sweet mother, do not weep; Rejoice with me, rejoice, rejoice--I m weary--let--me--sleep. AM.H. JUBILEE OF EMANCIPATION.--IV. BEFORE giving our readers the history of the English Relief Act of 1778, it will be well to recall, as far as we can, . the state in which English Catholics were at that period. It must be remembered that only three-and-thirty years had then passed since the last attempt of the Stuart family to regain the throne. Many Catholic families, as well as many Protestant families of the Tory party, were known to have sympathised with Charles Edward Stuart in 1745. But although there were many Catholics in the Highland army which invaded England, a very few of the English made any attempt to assist the Prince. Charles Edward was still alive in 1778; and although during the thirty years which followed his gallant enterprise, the British Catholics had gradually, but effectually, and for ever, transferred their allegiance to the House of Hanover, yet strong political motives, as well as religious hatred, prompted our Protestant fellowcountrymen to keep us down. But as years went by it became...
