See page 118. In compression, absorption, and combination compression and absorption plants, the Cochrane Steam-Stack Heater takes care of all surplus exhaust steam about the plant, as well as hot drips, without regard to the quantity. The pumps, for instance, may produce either more or less steam than is required for heating the boiler feed water. If more, the excess, already purified of oil, will be available for making ice; if less, it will be supplemented by the engine exhaust. There is no waste. In plants where the exhaust steam is used largely for heating in the winter and for ice making or refrigerating in the summer, the Steam-Stack Heater serves the purpose of both systems most conveniently. The heater shown on page 120 is installed in an absorption refrigerating plant, where it receives the exhaust of pumps and other auxiliaries under back pressure, the shell being cast in one piece and the heads being heavily stayed to withstand a pressure of 40 lbs. In the top of the heater is a pipe opening for vacuum pump returns, in addition to the usual vent and trap discharge openings. MEASURING THE BOILER FEED WATER In large steam plants, such as central stations, economy of operation usually receives the scrutinizing attention of experts, but in isolated plants, such as those in which exhaust steam heating is employed, the possibilities for improving economy are often not so keenly searched out, with the result that...
