Broom, Legal Maxims, p. 1. It is upon the maxim and the principle it embodies, when the danger is pressing and imminent, that public officers or private citizens may, without incurring liability, to prevent the spread of an existing conflagration, enter upon the premises of a citizen, raze or demolish houses or other structures, as they may destroy or use any property to obstruct or prevent the advance of a hostile army. In such an event there is no duty or obligation resting upon the government or any of its agencies to make compensation for the property injured or destroyed. Compensation is matter of grace, and not of right. 2 Dill. Mun....
