Nearly all the older colleges, such as Harvard, Yale and Princeton, were founded in the fear of God, with the blessing of heaven invoked; they gave religious instruction to the students, and had weekly and daily exercises of praise and prayer to Almighty God. But some of them, as they became larger and had a greater and more varied constituency of teachers and students, found a difficulty in carrying out this thoroughly, and are abandoning one position after another, till now little is left. Several colleges founded at a later date make no profession of religion. The universities under State control, being troubled in dealing with the various sects - Christian and Jewish, Catholic and Protestant - have found it easiest to give up all religious services of a systematic kind. I am not sure that the public generally are realizing the change that is taking place - regular preaching being given up one year, and Sabbath and daily devotional exercises a few years after.
