Vocational Education. Early investigations of the causes of withdrawal from school, particularly those which recorded the statements of pupils and parents, as in the Minneapolis survey, brought out the fact that neither pupils nor parents regarded schooling beyond the grades as of very material aid in gaining a livelihood. A few studies were made, correlating wages and salaries with time spent in school. Then the rapid growth of manual training, shop courses, and definite training for the industries, supplied material for a whole literature of vocational investigation and survey. This soon passed beyond the content of the curriculum to the industries themselves, culminating in the thoroughgoing survey of the Cleveland type, in which the whole city is analyzed vocationally and the data, quantitative as well as qualitative, are practically and constructively related to the schools and their program. It is interesting to note that in this connection, the first chapter of the Bloomington, Indiana, survey report treats of the occupations of the women and the men employed in the city. Ages of Pupils and Progress...
