It is present in considerable quantities in the after-damp formed in explosions where coal dust forms part of the combustible material. It is formed by the combustion of gunpowder, and in all cases where carbon is not sufficiently burnt for want of oxygen. It is to be seen over a still red fire in a furnace burning with a blue flame. It is generated spontaneously in a gob from the accumulation of slack left there. It has been found in a very small proportion, in some samples of fire-damp in Germany, and in the natural gas of Pennsylvania. Excepting possibly in a very small degree, it is not likely to be present in a mine without combustion of some kind be going on somewhere in the workings of the mine.
